INTRODUCTION

Environmental site assessments are now an important component of real estate transactions, especially for commercial and industrial property. State and federal laws (e.g., the Illinois Environmental Protection Act, the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act [CERCLA], and the Illinois Responsible Property Transfer Act [IRPTA]) require landowners and prospective land purchasers to be aware of the environmental condition of property they own or control. According to the Standard Practice for Environmental Site Assessments: Phase I Environmental Site Assessment Process (Practice E-1527-97), prepared by the American Society for Testing and Materials (ASTM), a historical records review is a necessary step for conducting Phase I environmental site assessments. The main objective of historical records reviews is to determine land use history and to identify environmental conditions or hazards associated with a property.

Since 1989, the Illinois State Geological Survey (ISGS) has been conducting environmental site assessments throughout the state for the Illinois Department of Transportation. In 1996, the ISGS published A Manual for Conducting Preliminary Environmental Site Assessments for Illinois Department of Transportation Highway Projects (ISGS Open File Series 1996-5). ISGS staff have become aware of the importance and usefulness of local library holdings when conducting historical records reviews for an environmental site assessment. Other environmental professionals, both in the public and private sector, likewise use historical information when conducting site assessments. It has become clear that a directory of relevant Illinois library holdings would be extremely useful for environmental professionals. The ISGS Library and Environmental Site Assessments Section collaborated to compile this directory of historical resources commonly used in environmental site assessment work.

In September 1997, a questionnaire was mailed to approximately 750 Illinois libraries, requesting information on their historical holdings for specific items often used in the environmental site assessment process. These items are described in greater detail in the following section on historical resources. For most resources, the following data were requested: town(s) covered, author, title, publisher, and period of coverage. The ISGS received 300 responses to the survey; 288 responses are included in this directory. Responses are compiled in tabular format and organized alphabetically by county and then by city within a county. Listings in the directory vary in the amount of data presented, because libraries generally reported only their specific holdings. In some cases, a telephone follow-up or on-line holdings search was required to clarify information. The goal was to obtain representative library coverage of the state. Only those libraries that supplied information on historical holdings, as well as current holdings, were included in this directory. Figure 1 gives the number of libraries reported in this directory by county. An index of counties, cities, and libraries is included. This index is the primary searching mechanism to locate a listing for an area of interest.

It should be noted that historical resources for a county or city may be housed at other locations in addition to libraries, including local planning and zoning agencies, local building departments, the county assessor's office, the county clerk's office, public health or sanitation departments, local and county historical societies, and museums. These locations are not covered in this directory; however, if the environmental professional needs more information, trips to these offices are often the next step in discovering historical land use and whether a potential for environmental concern or hazard exists for a property.

All information in this directory was provided by the libraries themselves and was not field-verified by the ISGS. Because library collections continually grow and change, the ISGS recommends calling the library of interest before a visit to verify that a particular resource is still at that location. The telephone numbers of the local libraries are included in this directory. The inclusion or exclusion of any library in or from this document does not constitute or imply ISGS endorsement or lack thereof.

HISTORICAL RESOURCES OFTEN USED IN ENVIRONMENTAL SITE ASSESSMENTS

A variety of maps, photographs, documents, and publications are used to obtain a complete picture of the historical land use at a project site and to identify potential environmental conditions or hazards in the area. The following are some of the most common resources used in gathering such historical information.

Aerial photographs

Aerial photographs are taken from an airplane or helicopter at a low enough altitude to allow identification of development or activities. The photographs are used to determine historical land use and developmental change through time. Aerial photographs show all existing features in an area, such as land disturbances, stressed vegetation, landfill activity, flooding, and excavation or construction occurring at the time of photography. The distinction among agricultural, residential, or urban land use can also be easily determined. A sequence of aerial photographs provides an estimate of the timing of construction or land disturbance. Additionally, the viewer can often determine the nature of a structure by its shape or configuration. For example, the typical configuration of a gasoline station with its circular drive, dispenser island, and small main structure is easy to identify. Above-ground storage tanks are often discernible as well.

Fire insurance maps

Produced by private fire insurance companies, fire insurance maps provide information on property use. They indicate the locations and uses of buildings, primarily in urban areas, and are available for many towns. The principal publisher of original maps was the the Sanborn Map Company. Many maps have been republished on microfilm or microfiche by the Sanborn Map Company, Chadwyck-Healey, and University Publications of America. Dating back to the late 1800s, these maps have been periodically updated and include detailed representations of urban streets and the structures located along them. Because building occupancy is typically indicated, these maps can be used to identify a property that was once occupied by a gasoline station or other facility that could be of environmental concern. Specific information, such as the number and location of gasoline tanks on a parcel, the size of the tanks, and the materials used in building construction, is often given. In addition, these maps show residential dwellings and mine shaft locations. The maps often include very detailed layouts of large industrial facilities. A sequence of fire insurance maps provides a valuable record of developmental change in urban areas.

City directories

City directories list property owners by address in urban areas. They provide specific information on types of businesses and can provide a record of changes in an area over time. These directories often date back to the late 1800s. Local libraries generally carry only city directories specific to their city or town. Common publishers of city directories include Polk, Haines, Criss-Cross, R.R. Donnelley, and Hill.

Telephone books

If a researcher is aware of the name of a particular landowner or business of interest, historical telephone books may help narrow down the years of occupancy of a parcel by that party, since address information is included.

Business directories

The Illinois Manufacturers Directory provides information on manufacturers, which is supplied by participating companies; therefore, inclusion in these volumes is optional. Useful information commonly found in these annual directories include the street address of an industry, year of establishment, product manufactured, and Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) code. The type of product and the SIC code provide information that can be used to determine the types of regulated substances and wastes that may be used or generated by the facility.

Similar in scope to the Illinois Manufacturers Directory, the Illinois Services Directory provides similar information on service industries, some of which may use regulated substances. Examples of service industries of potential concern are auto repair shops, dry cleaners, building contractors, landscape design firms, and photo processing shops.

Similar directories include What to Sell and What to Buy and the Directory of Illinois Manufacturers.

Local historical books and newspaper articles

Local libraries often house publications about the early history of a town, especially commercial and industrial development. These books can provide valuable information and photographs about “the way things used to be.” Many libraries have a collection of historical newspapers on microfilm or microfiche, or a vertical file of articles pertinent to the town of interest, or sometimes both. Vertical file information is often categorized by subject.

Plat books, maps, or atlases

Plat books, maps, or atlases provide information on current and past ownership of land parcels. They are generally available for each county. Because these maps were first published in the late 1920s and have been updated periodically throughout the years, a sequence of plat maps can provide information on changes in property ownership. Plat maps may also identify land ownership of facilities that may use or handle regulated substances.

Township maps

Township maps are available for each county, but may be less detailed than the plat books. They include information on city boundaries and streets, but not always on land ownership.

Rural directories and gazetteers

Directories and gazetteers are primarily helpful in precisely locating a rural site because of their detailed road labeling and documentation of municipal boundaries. They also provide names of owners of parcels that are too small to be labeled in plat books, and ownership may be more current in the plat book.

EXAMPLE ENTRY LAYOUT

The following example depicts the layout chosen for each library entry and includes a short description of the type of information contained in each section of the entry.

LIBRARIES - COUNTY - CITY

Section 1: Library name, address, phone number, e-mail address if applicable, and hours that the library is open. If hours are given for a "Special Collection Room" or "Local History Room", these are included as well.
Section 2: Resources - Historical resources are listed in the following order when a library has indicated that this resource is available; if a particular resource was not listed on the questionnaire response for a particular library, then it does not appear in Section 2. Titles, authors, publishers, and dates of resources are given when provided by the library.
